

"I would say I'm pro-choice. But these pictures are pretty mind-changing." - Ethan, student at Otterbein University (Ohio)

When abortion victims are seen, opposition to abortion increases. Abortion advocates know this. And so they resort to mockery and violence to censor the victims.

Nowhere has this been seen more clearly this fall than at Ohio University (Athens, OH). For years, pro-abortion students on campus have brandished homemade signs to oppose our message of human equality. Their failure to halt our efforts led this fall to professional abortion advocates from NARAL Pro-Choice Ohio joining the fray.

NARAL staff members showed students the way of avoiding meaningful dialogue—Gabriel Mann, Communications Manager of NARAL Pro-Choice Ohio told Athens's The Post, "We don't condone engaging with anti-abortion protesters at all"—while also trying to mock the babies and our team.

One NARAL member donned a large purple uterus costume and told The New Political, "I want to bring this gender-neutral uterus to the forefront of this protest," leaving many scratching their heads. But while her message was at best unintelligible, it was at worst an illustration of our position. For while her body was mostly hidden, it was clear there was a person inside the uterus costume—ironically akin to babies hidden from view within their mothers' bodies.

But these silly efforts took a violent turn when a masked thug began beating the victims depicted on our signs with a club. He'd emerged from the crowd of abortion advocates with mask and weapon to attack the babies with force reminiscent of the violence with which they'd been initially dismembered. Our team immediately confronted him, halting his tirade. But he held up his weapon in a clear threat of physical violence before disappearing back into the crowd and escaping.

Abortion advocates want pictures of the babies censored so badly they resort to violence. At Ohio University, one student donned a mask and used a club to beat our signs and threaten our team. Watch: <http://bit.ly/2cInOWD>. The police investigation is ongoing.

Ohio University police are actively working to identify the student. He will face charges of criminal mischief and menacing.

We are not surprised when abortion advocates display violent behavior. They already praise killing behind closed doors of abortion facilities. Love of hidden violence eventually manifests itself publicly.

When we arrive on campus, lovers of abortion-killing know they have everything to lose. Their frenzied responses lead to self-parody and violence. This desperation underscores the power of abortion victim photography. They know what happens when the babies are seen: we win. That is why they want so badly to stop our team.

New Study Confirms Abortion Pictures Work

Dr. Jacqueline Harvey, professor of political science at Tarleton State University, has released the first study on the impact of pro-life activism with abortion victim photos. Analyzing data collected in the wake of pro-life projects, she notes 67% of respondents say victim photos cause them to feel more negatively about abortion (see graph). While this does not mean those individuals are now fully anti-abortion, the study further shows negative feelings correlate to supporting efforts to restrict abortion.

Dr. Harvey concludes, “[A]bortion victim imagery itself, regardless of presentation, is intrinsically effective at altering previously positive perceptions on abortion and changing the culture.”

The Biblical commandment to expose fruitless deeds of darkness (Eph 5:11) provides the most vital mandate for our use of victim imagery. Nevertheless, we are encouraged by this quantitative evidence of the effectiveness of our strategy.

We see evidence of Dr. Harvey’s research every day. Encountering our display for the first time this fall, Columbus State Community College student Will recently declared, “Oh, that’s a baby! I’ve never seen a picture like that.”

When Will saw the victims, how he felt about abortion changed. “I just thought it was a normal process,” he confessed. “Now, I see the face and the arms. That’s sick.” He concluded, “That’s wrong as h***.”

Stories like Will’s demonstrate the effectiveness of abortion victim photography. It was not the rhetoric of our team which changed Will’s mind. God used the babies themselves to stir Will’s conscience.
